When we think of biographies, we naturally think of the famous, the great in our society. But when it happens that someone generally thought of as unimportant in the scheme of history tells of their journey through this world, we discover that the uncommon story is even more fascinating than the common one.

By the time Russell Ridenour died a few years ago, most folks probably thought of him as being an eccentric, somewhat reclusive old man. Though he'd built a new house in Lagro, he never lived in it, preferring to remain in the shabby old building that stood beside it.

People who knew him remembered a little about his past, mostly those half-myths that grow up around people with the details shady around the edges. It was known that he'd once killed a man and done some prison time for it. Without the softening touches of a family, he became in old age increasingly rougher and gruffer.

But Russell Ridenour had a story and he wanted to tell it. From the mother) was crying. I did not know the meaning of the words, But I was made to remember them!"

Shortly afterward, Russell's mother was declared insane and put in an asylum and he never saw her face again until her death. The law in Indiana then was that an insane spouse could not be divorced so Russell's father lived in one place while Russell boarded with another family, in a home not his own.

Russell had hoped that "when I grew up and made my own way, That I could get married, and have a home of my own. I overlooked that word, Never."

No one would ever tell him the truth about his mother's illness and though he fell in love at least once, he chose to leave her in the fear that he would pass on to his own children the curse of his mother's insanity.

When we think of biographies, we naturally think of the famous, the great in our society. But when it happens that someone generally thought of as unimportant in the scheme of history tells of their journey through this world, we discover that the uncommon story is even more fascinating than the common one.

By the time Russell Ridenour died a few years ago, most folks probably thought of him as being an eccentric, somewhat reclusive old man. Though he'd built a new house in Lagro, he never lived in it, preferring to remain in the shabby old building that stood beside it.

People who knew him remembered a little about his past, mostly those half-myths that grow up around people with the details shady around the edges. It was known that he'd once killed a man and done some prison time for it. Without the softening touches of a family, he became in old age increasingly rougher and gruffer.

But Russell Ridenour had a story and he wanted to tell it. From the heart of the hard-shelled man came 22 typewritten pages of writing that have an elegance to them, almost a poetry.

"I wonder if I am supposed to try to tell others of the things that I have been privileged to know, of Jesus Christ, and of God, I am not sure," he wrote. "I am sure there are some things that are meant for me, But in order for you to understand, And know, I will need to tell some of that which I feel is personal. So I ask, God, and his son, Jesus Christ, To help and guide me as I write this, That I would do as they would have me to do? ..."

Russell's earliest memory is of a voice, an all-mighty and powerful voice that guided him throughout the rest of his life.

"We, my Dad and Mother and I had been to my grandfather's, and we were on our way home, it was late at night, and I must have been asleep," he wrote. "Suddenly I had a terrible feeling of doom, and I was made aware of everything ... That we were riding in a buggy, That we had just came up a big hill and the horse was walking, Of the pasture field on the one side of the road, and of the big woods ahead.

"I heard the cry of a night bird, and then a voice spoke to me. ('This is the end, the very end, you shall never know your mother, nor a home as others do!'). I knew that the man, (my father) was very perturbed, and that the woman, (my mother) was crying. I did not know the meaning of the words, But I was made to remember them!"

Shortly afterward, Russell's mother was declared insane and put in an asylum and he never saw her face again until her death. The law in Indiana then was that an insane spouse could not be divorced so Russell's father lived in one place while Russell boarded with another family, in a home not his own.

Russell had hoped that "when I grew up and made my own way, That I could get married, and have a home of my own. I overlooked that word, Never."

No one would ever tell him the truth about his mother's illness and though he fell in love at least once, he chose to leave her in the fear that he would pass on to his own children the curse of his mother's insanity.

Life during the Depression was hard. Russell lost his state construction job because then in Indiana only married men could hold them. He worked sometimes for 55 cents a day and dinner. He hunted and trapped.

It was a man who'd been accused of stealing from the traplines who attacked him on the road one day. The man picked up a chunk of ice to hit him and Russell struck him one open-handed blow to make him drop the ice. Fourteen days later the man died and Russell went to the county seat and gave himself up. The sheriff advised him to plead guilty in return for a sentence of one to 10 years and he did.

He was a conscientious prisoner who did more than his share of work and caused no trouble. He became a trustee and was eventually paroled. He made good his parole.

Periodically throughout his life, the voice came to Russell. No matter how hard the words were to live up to, he found comfort in his belief that his life was part of God's design. And even if he did not always understand it, Russell had complete faith that the design was good.

I (Larry Biehl) do not know who this file is from. The statement 'one Daniel is my branch' could mean Mom since a Daniel was Mom's Great-Great Grandfather. But 'one David was your branch' could also mean Mom since a David was Mom's Great-Great-Great Grandfather.
